

Transition from Early Intervention Staff Development Resources and Plan

- 1. Open a discussion about transition during a virtual staff meeting. Before your staff start the learning path, pull them together for a virtual meeting about transition or add this to your staff meeting agenda. Use open-ended questions to facilitate a discussion that airs out the challenges and makes room for successes and strategies. Be open to hearing what your staff still need to know. After the discussion, introduce the Transition from Early Intervention Learning Path.
- 2. Guide your staff through the Transition from Early Intervention Learning Path.
  - Option A: Instruct your staff to do one activity on the path before each staff meeting for the next 6-7 meetings.
  - Option B: Convene a special transition discussion group to do each activity together virtually then discuss insights.
  - Option C: Give your staff a deadline for completing the learning path, then get together to discuss what was learned using guiding questions based on what your staff need to know or skills they need to develop.
  - Option D: Identify staff partners to work through the learning path together by completing activities and coming together regularly to meet. After all partners have completed their work, pull the whole group together to discuss what was learned, share insights, and plan for future staff development.
- 3. Continue the learning with the Shooting the Transition Hoop Learning Byte. Learning across time is always more effective than learning from one webinar, so you can continue the conversation by using the Shooting the Transition Hoop Learning Byte. The purpose of this activity is to guide learners as they review key things to remember about transition and reflect on how they can use this information in their daily work with children and families. This could be an activity you do after a group discussion about what was learned from the learning path as a way to debrief. Or, use this learning byte two weeks or a month later to refresh and revisit transition.
